An amusing feature of the trial was that the spotter, Oscar Swensen, who had been appointed a deputy marshal for the purpose of securing a case against the whisky sellers, had, according to the showing in court and street rumors, got so loaded with his evidence that he got mixed as to which of the Curtises sold him the beer on which the case was made. In the complaint and in his testimony on the stand he said that George Curtis served him with the beer, and received the money for the same, and Willson Conover, who was with him at the time the beer was bought, testified that it was Will who sold the beer. On the strength of this testimony, City Attorney Rydiach caused a complaint to be made charging Will Curtis with the crime, to which he subsequently pleaded guilty. The jury in George's case was instructed to bring in a verdict of guilty by Judge Hall on the ground that the booze was sold in George's place of business, and that Will was acting as his agent. To date not more than 750,000 pounds are been shipped out of that State. He says the only wool shipped out of Idaho thus far this season were two carloads from Mountain Home and one from Bliss, and this wool was contracted for last fall. Several Eastern buyers are now in Boise, but it seems they are not doing much buying. They appear to be waiting for a more auspicious time in which to buy. It is estimated the Idaho output this season will be in excess of that of last year.

day night, so stirred a deplorably small andlence that the principals were called to the curtain again and again. Mr. Mantell's Macheth is without doubt the most artistic interpretation of the role that has been seen in the country since the days of Booth and Barrett, but his acting is not a whit better than Miss Russell's as Lady Macbeth.

Mr. Mantell's portrayal of the conscience-obsessed Scotsman approached perfection in every particular. His deep, stentorian voice is especially adapted to the part. In mion, gesticulation and mannerisms, Mr. Mantell at all times displayed ar nesiduous study of the role faithfully impressing upon his auditors the enormous strength and intense personality of the afterwards tyrant, Macbeth.

In the first act, when she consigned her soul to evil, Miss Russell gave a well-nigh remarkable exhibition of her ability as a tragedlenne. The part of Lady Macbeth too often has been interpreted by persons who scarcely understood it. Miss Russell was entirely free of all labored effort. She depended more on her real histrionic talents to portray the lady than on the usually exaggerated speaking of the lines. Her articulation was perfect, her voice soft and seldom modulated. But she brought out the character of Lady Macbeth with an intensity that was spell-binding, emotions seeming to creep into binding, emotions seeming to creep into her very veins as she voiced her limit-less hopes of ruling, and imparted her hideous suggestion of killing the king to her husband. Her selection of costumes

Francis McGinn played Macduff with the grace of a porter, the which he resembled in costume and voice. The part so big, and it is a pity so unfortunate a selection was made. He shared honors with Walter Campbell, as Duncan, King of Scotland. Malcolm, the young son of he king, was presented naturally by Guy king, was presented naturally by Guy the king, was presented naturally by Guy Lindsley.

Special mention should be made of the staging of the production. It might be said, en passant, that although it is perhaps fashionable to come late to the theater, a moving pageant of merry widow hats and handsome gowns, to say nothing of the spectacle of removing overcoats in the midst of an act, scarcely contribute to the excellence of a Shakespearean production. The curtain at today's matince will rise at 2 o'clock sharp. The play is "Hamlet."

That the Orpheum management is putting out a good bill this week is evidenced in crowded houses that are nightly scating themselves before the footights at this house. In every particular the turns presented are of the high order which furnish entertainment, while in some instances they excite marvel. The bill is to carry throughout the entire week, with matiness every afternoon.
